Excerpt: . . . world, based on individual experiences and schema ( Wilhelmsen, Asmul, and Meistad, 1998 ). The constructivist theories of learning are particularly appropriate for collective skills training in VLEs as this learning approach leverages the power of performance modeling, peer tutoring, and peer motivation as tools to enhance learning. The review of theories of learning can provide the basis for identifying theory-driven technology-based approaches to meeting training requirements ( Lajoie, 2000 ). The need exists to identify how cognitive principles and pedagogical design can be applied to meet battle staff collective training goals. Cognitive principles and techniques that would apply to VLE collective training have recently been documented by Sanders ( 2001 ) and Lussier, Ross, and Mayes ( 2000 ). Train-the-Trainer. The Train-the-Trainer requirement associated with the introduction of the DL training approach needs to be identified and documented as an essential contributor to the success of the training system. An essential goal of any training system is that it be robust, and scalable as the demand for classes increases. A key concern that drives the Train-the-Trainer requirement is the potential for a shortage of instructors as DL courses proliferate and the instructor demand increases in turn. The development of instructor training, establishment of student performance standards, and development of reliable student performance assessment tools are essential to ensure consistent training across instructors for a robust training program. The introduction of advanced DL training technology, and the requirements for instructors to perform as role model and mentor, leveraging a growing set of VLE technology capabilities, can create a significant..
